Curator's Statement:

The recreating of nature refers to any artist's interpretation of the outside world. Every artist sees their surroundings with a unique set of eyes. Therefore, as an individual works on a piece, they are immediately starting with their own perspective on it, before a mark is ever made. Realism is defined as the quality or fact of representing a person, thing, or situation accurately or in a way that is true to life. But as each human will see life uniquely, we then each have our own set of truths about what we see. Artists take this concept a step further by physical manipulation of a material. Implementing marks, making a record of a thing or taking a material and making it into something else.

About the Curator:

Stone works in a variety of mediums, but is best known for her humane taxidermy created with reclaimed North Atlantic longline fishing gear. Her next curatorial undertaking opens in October with a Small Group Show at the Cambridge Art Association, in which her work will be a part of.
